

The stability of the large banks is at grave risk. To protect the deposits and financial assets of bank customers, the capital reserves of the banks need to be separated between the investment divisions and the retail/banking divisions. The glass steagall Act would provide the legislation to regulate the banking sector as banking corporations need greater regulations to protect customers.