Subject: Have Your Say

I am not sure if there is a more formal way to express my concern over the proposed changes wrt climate reporting. The exercise will generate significant effort and cost for businesses with little or no effect. Energy prices are already so high in Australia that companies and individuals will do everything they can to keep them at an acceptable level. Whilst pushed by government, the climate crisis has not yet been statistically validated and in many world leading nations such as Sweden, Germany and Japan governments are backing away from emissions targets and decarbonisation goals. The proposed reporting changes can never be validated and as such are a completely redundant exercise. We do not need another government department burdening taxpayers and delivering zero value apart from the aesthetics of caring. As a country, even considering the quantities of coal and gas we export, we are carbon positive. Can we please take a fact based, common sense approach to this whole agenda topic and get it back into proportion.

Best regards,
